Shoot To The Beat

Don't let anyone tell you the military wastes our taxpayer dollars. The Army is trying to "smooth out the brain waves" of soldiers with stereo sounds in hopes it will make them shoot straighter. Soldiers with bad aim tend to overcorrect and miss again when shooting weapons such as rockets, Army psychologist James Caviness said. "The result is the rocket will go off course," was his brilliant conclusion. "This (technique) could help smooth out brain waves" and make it easier for them to shoot. The Army is testing combinations of tones that stimulate brain waves and purportedly reduce tension and enhance creativity and learning. The testing began Oct. 5 at Fort Benjamin Harrison in Indianapolis, where soldiers can now be seen running around wearing stereo headphones.
